Mary Beth Maziarz (pronounced: "MAY-zee-arzz") began singing in the jazz cafes, folk rooms, and elevated train platforms of Chicago while in college at Northwestern. After school, she moved to Park City, Utah, where she found the mountain community to be the perfect place to write songs, talk to interesting people, and appreciate the beauty of nature. A series of non-musical jobs bucked up her life experience and resume; time spent as a fine art framer (hmm...finger-devouring tablesaws...great for pianists!), a golf course beer cart girl, and a waitress of many fascinating establishments helped her use that "American Culture" degree as she found her way through it, up close and personal.

With Opening Act
Scott Hunt

What do you get when you combine a software QA engineer, a snow and water skier, a self-taught guitarist, and a father of five? Well, you get a singer/songwriter who has to work very hard to make time to write songs! Many of his songs get put together riding on the bus to Salt Lake City from Pleasant Grove. Scott brings a mix of pop rock and country to his songwriting. After a couple of decades of playing in cover bands, he decided to make country songwriting his main musical focus. About once every three months he travels to Nashville to meet other writers, co-write, and soak up all the great music at writer's nights around town. On a given day at Scott's house you'll hear his guitar, a daughter's cello, a son playing violin, another daughter on viola and his wife playing piano. Music must be in their DNA!
